A rubric is helpful to have. It provides support for a student or anyone to make sure information is accurate and helps you stay on track on what needs to be provided in the webpage or paper. It could be used to rate things such as a paper, website or even pizza. It helps integrate technology in a class. Having a rubric to help rate a website is helpful for a beginner and an expert. As how accurate the information provide may sound it can be wrong. You can make and use this for almost anything. You want to make sure you get the most information out of a website. Teachers can provide this for students so they can know what they need to provide on homework. They can even use this to make a wider view of information that is on the internet. It helps organize data, so that we can keep it clean and accurate. Students who are learning to use the internet websites can refer to this. The student can see the key points to know what a resourceful website is. Teachers and Professors use these things to categorize and show us students how we will be graded and what they are looking for in our work. We use this everyday even if we don't have it on paper. We use it for example to buy a computer or a tablet. We want to know the top features and what show we look when buying any technology device. We compare many things to one another and then rate to see which one is the best. I will use this rubric in my near papers, shopping or homework or classwork. It'll improve my thinking and skills to identify what information is best and accurate for what I am looking for. Rubrics are easy to make once you have the hang of it. Providing this in our research and classwork can help us a lot.
